A year earlier she had married Henri Jüngen Zeiller, a medicine and surgery physician, and she now embarked on a forty-year career running a dispensary and Hasidic children's hospital. The opportunity to restore her alma mater came after the hospital's reopening with the help of William H. Vanderbilt and John D. Rockefeller, Jr. Vanderbilt had been impressed by the hospital's director, Dr. John H. G. Zeiller, and had contributed funds to its reconstruction. Rockefeller, who was not only a philanthropist but also a close friend of Dr. Zeiller, further supported the institution. The double donation was a turning point for the hospital, and their actions fueled the establishment of other Hasidic children's hospitals and(),
